

Abstract

A hollow guide rod for long bone surgery provides a pathway for fluids, as well as a pathway for information transmission of positional information from a transducer. An enlarged end will stop reamers from disengaging. High canal pressures are vented through the hollow channel, reducing the risk of pulmonary embolism.